Abstract
This paper will seek to explore comparative attitudes towards their large diaspora populations exhibited by Italy and by Ireland during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. It will also examine the layered, complex and changing nature of diaspora communities by looking at the experience of Irish emigrants in Argentina and it will reconstruct elements of one specific migrants story (from postcards sent back to Ireland) which challenge a number of assumptions that are routinely made about Irish migrants, migration and diaspora communities.

Brian Jackson is Head of Postgraduate Studies at Institute of Technology, Carlow. Previously he was Director of the John Hume Institute for Global Irish Studies at University College Dublin. He is currently working on an intellectual biography of the Irish Jesuit writer Henry Fitzsimon an is preparing a critical edition of two manuscript works by Fitzsimon for the Irish Manuscripts Commission.